

CAPSULE SUMMARY
Stockett House
201 Prince George Street
(AA-661)

The large, three-story, central-passage Stockett House at 201 Prince George Street was originally constructed between 1853 and 1858 for Catherine and Andrew Chaney, and enlarged by them circa 1874. The expansive renovations, which created two separate dwellings, forced the owners to sell the property at public sale. Purchased as a single structure by John Shaaff Stockett, the building remained in the Stockett family until 1984 (almost 100 years). In ca. 1921, it was converted into two single-family dwellings for use as rental property, and by 1953 had been extensively renovated and returned to a single-family dwelling.

Constructed in two separate building campaigns, and significantly renovated in the 1950s, the dwelling is presently a three-story, five-bay, central-passage building presented in a 20th century Colonial Revival style. The original section of the house, as seen in the 1858 Sachse's Bird's Eye View of the City of Annapolis, was a two-story, two-bay building covered with a gable roof. In the early 1870s, the original house was raised to three stories, a portion of the facade was relaid in seven-course American bond, and a three-bay addition was constructed to abut the southeast wall of the narrow dwelling. The 1950s renovation left only certain aspects of the 1853-1858 and 1874 sections of the exterior and interior of the building intact. A two-story gable-roof addition was built during the 1950s renovation, on the site of a ca. 1874 two-story brick ell with a one-story glass greenhouse.

The large freestanding, brick dwelling located at 201 Prince George Street on the southwest side of the street between East Street and Maryland Avenue was constructed in two separate building campaigns. In the mid-19th century, the original section of the house was erected as a two-story, two-bay building covered with a gable roof. By the 1880s, a three-bay addition was built to abut the southeast side wall, more than doubling the original size of the building. In the 1950s, the dwelling was renovated and extensively altered, leaving only certain sections of the original exterior walls intact and some original interior features.

In general, however, the building is primarily a product of the 1950s and the Colonial Revival style. As it stands today, the three-story brick building is five bays wide with a central entry. It is elevated upon a high brick foundation and is covered with a sloped roof, featuring a wide bracketed wood cornice across the facade, and pairs of end chimneys on each end. A two-story addition, covered with a gable roof and abutting the rear wall, was built ca. 1950.

EXTERIOR DESCRIPTION:

The facade (northeast elevation) facing Prince George Street is five bays wide with a central entry and two windows to either side defining the first story and five bays of windows defining the second and third stories. A clear distinction in the brickwork, which is irregularly aligned and laid in opposing bonding patterns between the original section of the house and its addition, extends from the ground level to the third story. The two westernmost bays of the house are laid in seven-course American bond, while the three Eastern bays are laid in a six-course American bond. The construction date for the two sections of the facade are further distinguished by the mortar joints.

The first story is raised above ground level with basement level window openings capped by granite lintels. The central entry is reached by granite steps and a wrought-iron railing. A 1950s Colonial Revival-style engaged wood pediment surrounds a six-panelled wood door and fanlight. Two 6/6 windows with large interior beaded surrounds, louvered shutters, and wood sills, are located to either side of the entry. The second and third stories feature five 6/6 windows with similar surrounds. The window openings diminish in size, displaying the hierarchy of space within the building. A wide, bracketed wood cornice extends across the Prince George Street facade, obscuring the sloped roof behind. The wood brackets support a boxed wood cornice with an ogee-molded bed molding.

The northwest side elevation is laid in an irregular, random bonding pattern with sections of old and replacement brick combined. This side wall also reveals, upon inspection from an angle and a distance, lines of the original gable roof form with its paired exterior end chimneys still intact. Two 6/6 windows are located in the first and second stories in the rear bay of the main block; a single 6/6 window is located in the first story of a two-story shed-roof wing abutting the main block.

The southeast side wall has several 6/6 windows, and one 4/4 window randomly located in its surface. A single entry door is found on the southern corner of the elevation. Two rectangular openings are located at the basement level with granite lintels.

The southwest elevation of the house includes aspects of the various periods of construction on the house, much of which was altered in the 1950s. The two westernmost bays correspond with the two-bay shed roof addition to the original gable-roofed house; the three eastern bays are a result of the 1880s addition. A 1950s two-story rear ell with a gable roof and an end chimney abuts the interior bay of the original section of the house and one of the three eastern bays. The windows on this elevation are a combination of historic 6/6, contemporary casements, and a plateglass picture window. A door in the three-bay addition leads to the basement of the house.

INTERIOR DESCRIPTION:

The interior of the house has a central-passage, three-room plan, with the one, large room located in the original two-bay section of the house and the center hall and two front and rear rooms located in the three-bay addition. The interior detailing as presented today is a combination of the late 19th century alteration and the 1950s renovations. None of the original mid-19th century features survive.

The center hall is a long, narrow space with narrow wood floorboards running the length of the hall and a straight-flight Victorian stair located against the northwest side wall. The stair extends from the first to the third floor and features a fancy-turned newel post, turned balusters, stringer brackets, and a beaded side wall. Two doors open into the front and rear parlors on the southeast side of the house, while a contemporary double-wide door on center of the hall opens into the larger room on the northwest side of the house. All of the casings are square-edged and mitred.

The large room on the northwest side of the house extends from the front of the dwelling to the rear of the two-bay shed-roof addition. This space has been divided into two sections, including a small front sitting area and a larger living room, screened by a wide segmental-arched opening. A fireplace is located on center of the living room with windows to either side. The fireplace features a Victorian mantel of Carrara marble with a shield-like keystone motif above an arched opening. All of the trim, including the square-edged window casings, the arched opening surrounds, the coved crown molding, and the ogee-capped baseboards are from the 1950s renovations.

The front parlor, located in the eastern corner of the house, have a fireplace centered on its southeast wall. The mantel is Victorian in style, though painted slate as opposed to marble. The trim is identical to that found elsewhere on the first floor, and all from the 1950s, though the random-width wood floors survive. Originally the rear parlor, the kitchen has contemporary fixtures and a pantry.

The second floor of the main block of the house is divided into four rooms. The chimney breast located in the southwest corner room was enlarged to allow for the installation of a contemporary heating system. All of the trim is identical to that on the first floor, and all of the narrow wood floor boards are replacements. Some of the original six-panelled wood doors, set within their deep, recessed reveals survive intact. Contemporary bathrooms and closet space has been installed.

The third floor has some of the original late 19th-century square-edged casings with cornerblocks, and some of the 1950s square-edged and mitred casings commonly found throughout the rest of the house.

The basement of the house is a full-story space that reveals the stone and brick foundation walls. The stone foundation is located under the original two-bay section, with random-coursed brick walls above. The original back wall of this stone foundation has been removed and replaced with a brick foundation to support the shed-roof brick addition. The three-bay addition is set upon a brick foundation, laid in six-course American bond. The floor is a concrete slab. The windows are metal sash replacements.

The building at 201 Prince George Street was originally constructed sometime between 1853 and 1858 by Catherine and Andrew Chaney, and enlarged by them circa 1874. The expensive renovations, which created two separate dwellings, forced the owners to sell the property at public sale. Purchased as a single structure by John Shaaff Stockett, the building at 201 Prince George Street remained in the Stockett family until 1984 (almost 100 years). The building was converted by the heirs into two single-family dwellings in circa 1921 for use as rental property. In 1953 the dwelling was renovated and was returned to a single-family dwelling.

SITE HISTORY

The building at 201 Prince George Street is located on a portion of Lot 85 that was surveyed by Stoddert in 1718 for Amos Garrett. One of the most important merchants in Annapolis in the early 18th century, Amos Garrett made his fortune by lending money at interest and dealing in imported goods. Following Garrett's death in 1726, his heirs sold the property to John Brice, Sr. Listed as a gentleman, merchant, and planter, John Brice immigrated to Annapolis about 1698 from England. Following Brice's death in 1713, his will devised all land and improvements to his wife, Sarah Worthington Brice. When Sarah Brice died in 1729, the land was transferred to her eldest son, John Brice, Jr. The estate consisted of Lot 85 and Lot 94. The Brice House at 42 East Street was later constructed on Lot 94.

The property remained in the Brice family throughout the early 19th century. Sometime between ca. 1760 and ca. 1790, the dwelling designated today as 80-82 East Street was constructed on the southwestern edge of the property. In 1841, Margaret C. Smith, the daughter of John Brice, III, sold the entire parcel to John T. Barber. John T. Barber (1804-1864) was a farmer as well as a prominent landholder in Annapolis.

BUILDING HISTORY

In 1853, Barber conveyed the northwest portion of the larger lot that fronted on Prince George Street to Catherine L. Chaney. Sometime between 1853 and 1858, Chaney constructed the original two-story, two-bay brick building on the site, as seen in the ca. 1858 Sachse's Bird's Eye View of the City of Annapolis.

By the latter part of the 1850s, John Barber began to further subdivide his land holdings, selling a portion of the East Street property that extended east to Prince George Street to George M. Taylor in 1857, and in 1859, assigning Andrew Chaney as trustee "to hold and manage said property," that included "a lot lying on Prince George Street in the City of Annapolis and an adjoining lot on East Street improved by dwelling houses erected thereon."¹ The husband of Catherine L. Chaney, Andrew Chaney was responsible for collecting rents, issues, and profits, paying the net proceeds to Mary Barber. One year prior to his death in 1864, John T. Barber transferred ownership of the property to his son John T. Barber, II for the sum of $250, although Chaney was retained as trustee. Simultaneously, Barber officially granted Catherine Chaney "all the rights and privileges to all the ground previously conveyed," as well as an additional section of the large Prince George Street lot. This second parcel was located to the southwest of the original section and included a brick kitchen.

In the years 1866 and 1868, Andrew Chaney was charged for one brick house and lot on Prince George Street, valued at $1,000. Owing a great deal of money to the Farmers National Bank by 1870, Catherine Chaney was forced to use the dwelling house at 201 Prince George Street as security, insuring it for $2,000, and assigning Alexander Hagner and Frank H. Stockett as trustees.

The Maryland Gazette of August 25, 1874 documents that Chaney was unable to repay the bank notes, which were put up for public sale in September 1874:

"...all that very desirable LOT OF GROUND, on Prince George Street, in the city of Annapolis, now in the occupancy of James A. Medley. The lot fronts about forty feet on the south side of the street, and has a depth of about two hundred and thirty feet, and is improved by a new double three-story BRICK DWELLING HOUSE now divided for convenience into two houses. This property will be sold entire or as separate houses, with lot attached.... This is a most desirable property for persons desiring a residence, or for the purpose of keeping a boarding house, for which its large size and many rooms and conveniences especially fit it."² brick building had been enlarged by 1874, presumably by Chaney and, thus, causing her extensive debt. John Shaaff Stockett, clerk for the Court of Appeals, was the highest bidder for the property, purchasing the building in its entirety for $3,300. The sale was confirmed by the Equity Court and recorded in the land records in 1875.

Stockett transferred the property "with improvements...now occupied by him" to Mary P. Stockett in 1885 for $1,000. By this time, according to the Sanborn maps, the building had been improved by the construction of a glass greenhouse on the southwest elevation of the rear ell. Over the next one hundred years, the building was owned and generally served as the home of the Stockett family, having descended by various devises.

According the historic maps, by 1921, the building had been divided into two single-family dwellings. By 1953-1954, Margaret Hill (a Stockett descendant) and Harry W. Hill had inherited the building and returned it to a single-family dwelling. Additionally, a one-story frame garage was erected sometime after 1954 at the southwest corner of the property with automobile access from East Street.

In 1984, the building was sold out of the Stockett family for the first time since 1885. Purchased by Stewart B. Knowler at that time, the dwelling was devised to Joseph D. Corish and Jennifer A. Brust. By 1995, the owners had defaulted on the mortgage and the building was scheduled to be put up for public sale. Graham W. Gardner and Robert A. Bryant, who had owned and renovated 144 Prince George Street (AA-1194), were able to purchase the property prior to the public sale. Currently, the building is being renovated for use as a Bed and Breakfast.

However, regardless of historical significance, this house looks like a Federal town house (of the George-town variety) and as such adds a great deal to Prince George Street, especially next to the Dorsey House, etc.
